The real significance of the 1906 South African rugby tour, during which the ‘Sprinboks’ were born, went well beyond rugby, writes David Allen

A 1906 Springboks enshrined the national spirit of a country that had been separated from the destruction of the Anglo-Boer War. Few can forget the final South African Rugby Football Board President Sir A. D. R. L. F. Reahl, himself of South African descent, who had worked tirelessly to bring rugby to his country, the world, and the world to his country. The tour was a remarkable example of how a sport can bring people together, transcend borders, and forge a nation. The Springboks, the first Springboks, were formed as a result of this tour. They were a symbol of the spirit and values that South Africa would come to embody in the years to come. Their achievements were, in many ways, a precursor to the country’s future successes in sport and beyond.
